On Beginnings

This is placeholder text for the first essay. Replace it with your own writing whenever you're ready — the website reads this file directly, and the matching PDF is generated from it, so your words only ever live in one place.

Every beginning is a small act of faith. You commit words to a page without yet knowing where they lead, trusting that the path will reveal itself in the walking. The hardest sentence is almost always the first one.

Why we hesitate

We hesitate because a blank page holds every possible essay at once, and choosing one means letting the others go. That loss is quiet but real. The cure is not confidence; it is permission — permission to write badly, briefly, and then again tomorrow.

A practice, not a performance

Treat the beginning as a practice rather than a performance. Show up, make a mark, and let the work accumulate. What looks like inspiration from the outside is usually just the compounding interest of many unremarkable mornings.

Replace this closing paragraph with your own. Keep what rings true, cut what doesn't, and let the PDF regenerate from whatever remains.
